The U.S. supplies roughly 20% of globally traded seaborne diesel.

- An export ban would remove that supply from the market, exacerbating the global refining shortage that is driving the current high-price environment.

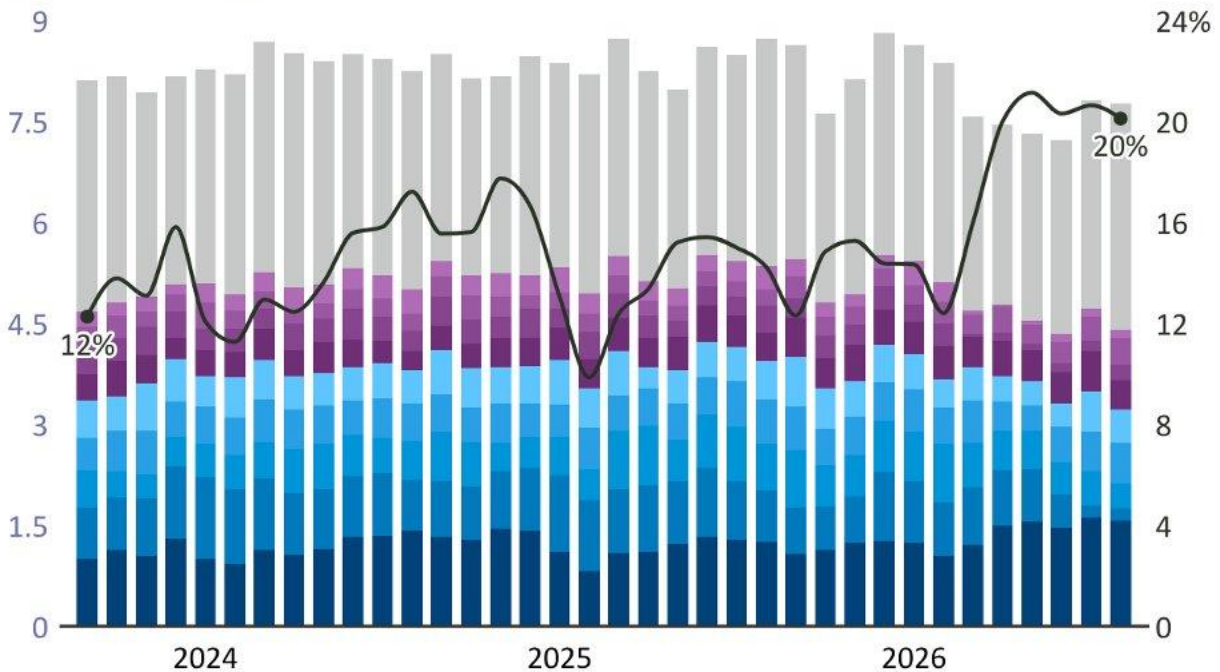

Global diesel trade has declined as a result of global conflict, but U.S. diesel exports are increasing and now represent ~20% of world exports

The Gulf Coast holds 54% of U.S. refining capacity and makes more fuel than it uses.

- The East Coast relies partly on imports. Banning exports would trap surplus diesel in one region while tightening the global market that supplies another.
